Ch15 intro: one coherent opening

Editing the landed chapter (books/the-stoic-husband/chapters/ch15/refined.md). This becomes its own commit, quoting your word.

Now

> Your kindness usually slips first over something small. She says something with an edge about the things that need doing. You feel it land. You're tired, and before you've decided anything, your answer is already in your mouth.

>

> In an ordinary day, your warmth gets tested three ways. Meet hostility with kindness. Meet frustration with patience. Meet disconnection with warmth.

What's wrong: it opens on a moment (her edge, you're tired), then jumps to a list of three. The list comes before you know what the three are. The tiredness belongs to the patience section, not here.

Proposed

> Warmth is easy on a good day. It gets tested on the ordinary ones, when nobody is at their best.

>

> Those days test it three ways. She's sharp with you. You're both fed up. A busy day pulls you apart. Each one has an answer: meet hostility with kindness, frustration with patience, and disconnection with warmth.

>

> It usually starts small. She says something with an edge about the things that need doing, and before you've decided anything, your answer is already in your mouth.

Then the first section opens: "Meet hostility with kindness. My family has a word for that kind of comment. We call it a zing..." So the zing is named right after the comment that shows it.

What it does: - Opens on warmth, which is the Sun arc. - Says the three tests in plain words first, then names the answers. - Ends on the one small moment that leads straight into the zing. - Drops "you're tired" (patience covers it later).

Reply yes, or give your wording.