Chapter 16, second proposal: Warmth Is Strength, the Sun-arc capstone Proposed 2026-11-05 05:40 UTC by the Developmental Editor from Round 6 (runs/ch16/interview.md). Not applied. On your yes it replaces the Chapter 16 entry in 03-outline.md as its own commit, then the chapter is rebuilt: the Researcher rebuilds the brief, the Ghostwriter writes a new draft. Everything you said in Rounds 0-5 stays in the knowledge files; this changes what leads.

What changes

- Center of gravity: from “the cold Stoic and his correction” to warmth as the capstone: calm (River) + strong (Oak) + loving (Sun) = a marriage in flow. - The coldness story shrinks to one short turn (~250 words), not the heart of the chapter. - New ah-ha (your idea, my wording; edit freely): “A marriage is one thing the two of you tend together. Keep it at peace, at its best, and flourishing, and it moves into flow.” - Flow is introduced (Csikszentmihalyi’s word, to be located and credited); the three Stoic words describe what flow looks like for a marriage. Applying it to a marriage is your step, said so. - The bank becomes a joint account. This is the “other place for deposits” you asked about, and it fixes the Chapter 7 clash. Chapter 7 says one man’s tally is one page of a two-page ledger. A joint account has one page: you both pay into the same account, you never count whose deposit was whose, and you watch whether the account is growing. That is reciprocation of attention and effort, and it is the joint unit in your ah-ha.

Proposed entry

Premise: Part III ends where the whole book has been heading. A husband who can stay calm (the River) and carry weight (the Oak) adds warmth (the Sun): attention, effort and joy he invests every day. When all three are working, the marriage stops being two people managing each other and becomes one thing, in flow.

The reader's takeaway: He sees the marriage as a joint account he keeps investing in, and knows what it looks like when it is working: at peace, at its best, flourishing.

Key points:

1. The capstone (opening, short). Calm got him through the storms; strength let him carry the load. Warmth is what those were for. (River and Oak named once each, as the book's own images.)
2. The old picture, briefly. Protector, provider, quiet until he demands or blows up. Calm was the first fix, and it could go cold: “I can’t control you,” her answer, and his lesson that “I can only control me” is a mindset, never a line said to her. One short section, ending on the turn toward warmth.

3. Warmth is compassion that moves toward her. You don’t take on her feelings; you want her in her highest state, and you act on it. Simple preferred indifference: “I’d like to conduct myself in a way that makes our marriage stronger, my wife happier, and helps us get towards eudaimonia.”
4. The joint account. A relationship is an investment, not a burden. Every kindness is a deposit into one account you share: good morning when traveling, the coffee, her back, the gift. Hers go in too. Nobody counts whose was whose; the bank never owes you money; you just keep it growing, because hard stretches draw on it. Covey is credited for the emotional bank account. Your grandfather's advice is a one-line callback to Ch12.

5. Flow. The modern word for when everything is going well: you're at peace and at your best. The Stoics had three words for it, and a marriage can have all three: equanimity (at peace), arête (at its best), eudaimonia (flourishing). "The health of the whole is more important than the health of the individual."
6. Close, positive. What it looks like on an ordinary day: the walk around the block, the movies, "She's my best friend." She feels loved, desired, a priority. The last line is yours, to confirm: "You should have the most credits with your wife because she is your number one." With the joint account, "credits" may read as your side. Option: "…the most invested in your wife, because she is your number one."

Stoic lesson: equanimity, arête and eudaimonia for the marriage (your step), with flow as the modern name; self-command as a mindset, not a line; compassion as warmth that acts.

Reader ah-ha: see above (yours to edit).

Research burden: Medium. Flow: Csikszentmihalyi (1990), locate and credit; no numbers unless read. Arête and eudaimonia glosses (have). Covey (have). Seneca and Marcus as now, only if they still fit. Gottman a clause at most.

Image: the joint account (deposits, account, invest). No sun lines. River and Oak named once in the opening as the book's arc names, not new metaphors.

Word target: 1,800-2,200.

Transition: none printed (Ch15 practice). Part IV is the Desert.

Decisions for you

1. Joint account: yes?
2. The ah-ha wording: keep mine, or give me yours.
3. The close: your credits line as is, or “the most invested in your wife”?
